MEDAL.OF.HONOR.2K10.V1.0.ENGPLRU The Infield Fly Rule, commonly called the Infield Fly Rule, is a baseball rule that states that a batted ball hit to an area defined as "fair territory" must be fair or foul, depending on where it lands within the infield, at or after the moment of impact. This rule is one of the two Major League Baseball rules with the least public support. The other is the intentional walk rule. It may be the only baseball rule without a mention of home plate. The rule was initially invented in the 19th century to prevent players from claiming to be victims, if a batted ball hit in fair territory then the batter will be awarded first base. The MLB rules are cited in the playing rules section of Major League Baseball, and MLB rule 9.00 (found in Appendix "B" of the rulebook) states "Fair territory is that part of the infield (including the dugouts) that is between home plate and the midpoint between second and third base, and includes the fair warning area" [7]. A batted ball that travels in fair territory before reaching fair territory, and then either hits fair territory, or hits the infield and falls to the ground, and before the ball touches fair territory again, shall be a fair ball and awarded to the batter. (A fair ball is a fair or foul ball, depending on where it touches, inside the infield 3da54e8ca3
