Total knee arthroplasty via a proximal fibular osteotomy: description of a new technique. A new technique of total knee arthroplasty with reconstruction of the anterior cruciate ligament is described for the management of difficult quadriceps femoris tightness in patients with stage 4 osteoarthritis of the knee. This procedure allows a proximal fibular osteotomy to be performed, which makes the use of a blocking device for soft tissues unnecessary and also allows for muscle recovery of the knee for early mobility.

Gangliosides and human megakaryocytic differentiation. Platelets circulate as complexes of a membrane envelope, plasma, and platelet granules. The platelet membrane consists mainly of phospholipids and cholesterol, the latter being the most concentrated glycolipid in the platelet. The main phospholipid and cholesterol-rich membrane of the mature human megakaryocyte is a pseudoplatelet, which is shed during the differentiation of the megakaryocyte to mature platelet. Glycolipids account for approximately 3% of the weight of the platelet membrane. Minor amounts of sialoglycoprotein components are also present. In this report, the distribution of gangliosides and neutral glycolipids in platelets and in the glycolipid-rich membrane of human megakaryocytes has been examined. A similar lipolysis and deglycosylation procedure was used for both platelets and platelet-enriched membranes to ascertain the distribution of the lipids in the platelet and the megakaryocyte. The major neutral glycolipids were GM1, GM2, lactosylceramide, and sulfatide, and minor amounts of GD1a, GD1b, GT1b, and GQ1b. A number of gangliosides were detected which were present in the normal platelet but not in the plasma membrane of the megakaryocyte. The main ganglioside was GT1b
